2014 in Review

The theme for 2014 might very well have been food. The farmers’ market, open every Saturday on the Wish House lawn between May and October, celebrated its eighth year. The Berkshire Country Store reopened under the management of Ryan Craig and Natasha Travieso; a welcome thing for skiers, tourists, and townspeople. The Cornwall General Store in Cornwall Bridge celebrated a strong first year and added a handsome paint job to its new look.

The food event of the summer, however, was the dinner put on by Community Table of Washington inside our covered bridge. The event (top price $250 a head plus a bus ride from midtown Manhattan) raised hackles and cheers in equal measure from merchants, hampered by the closing of the bridge and the lost traffic on a major fall weekend, had plenty to say. In the end, it was reportedly a good party and the next day life went on as usual.

Besides food, another basic need—housing—made the news last year. In June, the Chronicle reported that there were 29 residential properties for sale in town. They ranged in price from very reasonable to the $1.2 million for cash.

According to Jill Gibbons, the town’s economic development board president and chair of the Cornwall Valley Development Corporation, 2014 had been for cash.

Trinity Conference Center didn’t sell to the Zen Center of Brooklyn after all (a blow to the potential for serenity in town), but the Cornwall Conservation Trust completed an agreement to purchase 317 acres of Trinity’s mostly uphill land. Add to that two more acquisitions near Town Street and the trust finished the year 420 acres.

The Pink House in West Cornwall Village became the creamy yellow house, at least on the façade facing the street. This was the latest of the many colors that have graced the 158-year-old mansion.

Susan Francisco retired from her job as Board of Education clerk after 27 years.

Rocco Botto won the first Run the Valley 5K race, which had a field of 150 participants and benefitted the non-profit PharmaCares.

The CCS girls basketball team is Region One champ yet again.

And it was the summer of the historical society’s imaginative and moving Civil War exhibit and the events that enlarged upon its story.

The year ended with a splendid new lighting array for the Cornwall Bridge tree, powered, of course, by solar panels.

Children in Need in Cornwall

Even with a median income higher than much of the state ($78,021 a year vs. $69,519 a year), Cornwall has slightly more families living in poverty than the rest of the state (12.3 percent in Cornwall compared with 10 percent). More surprising? More than a quarter (31.4 percent) of the 325 children in Cornwall live in poverty, nearly twice the statewide level.

According to Jill Gibbons, the town’s economic development board president and chair of the Cornwall Valley Development Corporation, 2014 had been a strong year for Cornwall.

social services director, some of the economic strain is because many Cornwall residents are self employed (and therefore lack benefits), plus many of them work seasonally. Of course, when it comes to helping kids and families in need, income is only part of the picture.

Several local social services help children in need:
Cornwall social services: Any Cornwall families in need of support: financial, emotional, or practical, should make Jill Gibbons their first call (672-2603). For nearly 30 years, the town’s social services program has helped families connect with the resources in tough times. From the Heating Fuel Assistance Program to the Food & Fuel Fund to the food pantry, struggling families can get confidential help. Families may be eligible for more than they realize. For example, a family of four with income up to $62,528 a year may be eligible for heating fuel assistance.

The Cornwall Library: For the 10 and older set, the library offers an informal afterschool program where kids can go by themselves, and the librarians will keep an eye on them. More formally, the child center offers a library program once a week with its afterschool group. Tweens and teens may enjoy spending time in the newly established teen area, developed with support from the Cornwall Foundation. A 2014 experiment offering summer camp went so well that the library plans to expand summer camp to two full weeks in 2015 (likely $10 a week). In July, the library offers Wednesday evening educational and entertaining programs, such as presentations by the Children’s Museum. The library is also seeking grants to expand early literacy training for caregivers of very young children.

Beyond Cornwall’s borders, four organizations are key:
The Foundation for Community Health (Sharon): FCH provides funds for mental health, oral health, and access to services, as well as research and education programs for youth and families. For example, FCH offers prescription assistance and funds dental cleanings in all Region One schools.
Northwest Corner Prevention Network (Falls Village): A volunteer coalition of service providers, NCVPN receives funding from the state to improve the health and well being of youth and families in Connecticut.
The Housatonic Youth Service Bureau (Falls Village): Offers mental and behavioral health programs to kids ages 4 to 21 years.

Programs include Peers Educating Peers, Empowering Young Women, and Youth in Philanthropy. HYSB also sets teens up with valuable summer internships.
The Time Out Foundation (Lakeville): Time Out’s mission is to help children and young adults who need ongoing, non-judgmental support. The two main programs are wilderness-based therapeutic mentoring (more on Ed Thorney and that program in this issue) and equine-assisted therapy, which allows children to learn leadership, strength, courage, compassion, and trust as they care for horses.

Sanders Named to Region One

John Sanders is Cornwall’s new representative on the Region One Board of Education, replacing Phil Hart, who had served us ably in that capacity for 10 years. Commonly known as the “high school board,” the six-town panel also handles special education and other shared services directed by the superintendent’s office.

Sanders, a five-year resident of the town, grew up in several states and graduated from Franklin College in Indiana. He operates a varied marketing and medical business out of the old railroad station in West Cornwall with his wife, Janet. They have two children in Cornwall Consolidated School. Sanders volunteered for the regional position and was the unanimous choice of the CCS board.

This transition marks the latest step in what has become an ongoing controversy: how shall Cornwall’s Region One member be selected? At present, town regulations state that the local elementary school board appoints our Region One representative. Although that person does not have to be on the CCS board, tradition has it that the local board appoints one of its members, the theory being that articulation between the two schools is best handled by a person familiar with both. The same procedure is followed in Kent. However, in the other four towns, the Region One member is a separate ballot position, thus chosen by the majority of voters in a municipal election. A good case can be made that this more democratic procedure guarantees the representative strong support from the community at large. Proponents of direct election put the matter to a vote at a special town meeting back in May. The result: a 37-37 tie. The motion for direct election did not pass; thus the current procedure remains the rule.

So it is notable that the CCS board has now appointed John Sanders, who is not one of its members. Sanders will attend CCS board meetings to keep informed on local issues and share regional decisions with the town. Rachel Matsudaira, a CCS board member who was also willing to fill the vacancy, will continue as our alternate on the Region One board.

“I’m enjoying the meetings at the high school” Sanders states, “especially the people. There’s a lot going on in Region One, and this board will be busy and active. I’m ready to jump right in.”

Winter Bird Feeding

For those of you just starting out, here are some suggestions.

Black oil sunflower seed is nutritious, high in fat, and favored by the majority of birds that are likely to visit your feeder—like chickadees, titmice, cardinals, nut- hatches, and many others.

Fine cracked corn is preferred by ground feeders such as juncos, sparrows, and mourning doves. Scatter the seed within 10 feet of, and also under, good shrub cover.
After the holidays put your Christmas tree out on its side as a windbreak and scatter corn on the lee side.

Beef suet, raw from the supermarket meat department hung in a mesh bag, or suet cakes in metal cage feeders, is a high energy food and a winter substitute for insects. It attracts woodpeckers, titmice, and chickadees.

For those who would like to create a feeding station, Nyjer/black thistle seed attracts the “wandering winter finches” (goldfinches, pine siskins, and redbolls).

Raw peanuts are high in fat and protein. Provide shelled peanuts in a separate feeder or layer with sunflower seeds to make a “parfait” in a tube-style feeder. Blue jays love peanuts in the shell—on a tray or on the ground.

Metal containers are best to keep seed dry and rodents at bay but not necessarily bears. Connecticut Department of Energy and Environmental Protection furibearer biologist Paul Rego assures us that bears can be out and about on any day of the year, even in midwinter in mild conditions. You may need to bring your feeders in each evening or create a bear-proof setup, unless we have a good long spell of arctic weather!

Do check out the Cornell lab’s well-known Project Feeder Watch to see how you can help at birds.cornell.edu. Enjoy our birds!

The Healing Power of Nature

Many of us cherish the deep, soul satisfying pleasure of spending time in nature. For nearly a decade, Ed Thorney has been turning our woods, streams, lakes, and rivers into a classroom and counseling center for students at Cornwall Consolidated School.

A Gestalt therapist by training, Thorney created a wilderness-based therapeutic mentoring program. In his private practice, he works with all ages, from children with social and/or emotional challenges to executives who want to hone their leadership skills.

Through the Time Out Foundation in Lakeville, Thorney offers his unique, one-on-one outdoor therapy with two to four CCS students each year. He estimates he’s worked with 25 to 30 students since former CCS principal Kathleen Fitzgibbons brought him in nine years ago. Fitzgibbons described the program as having a “greater ability to heal a wounded child than anything I’ve seen.”

When the school refers a student to Thorney, he starts by meeting with the child to figure out a couple of activities he or she particularly enjoys, whether it’s hiking or canoeing or, in these winter months, playing ping pong or wood working. Sometimes they start by just playing with Thorney’s two dogs, Zoe and Dakota.

Thorney then meets with the students each week for nearly three hours for a year, sometimes longer. No cell phones, no distractions. Just being together, talking, and listening. If it sounds a little old fashioned, it is. Thorney said he spends time with kids the way a grandfather or favorite uncle used to, before families got so busy and scattered.

Thorney said his program works because kids open up about what’s going on with them when they are doing something else. Thorney said, “Physical activity is almost required if you want to connect with that child without their feeling intimidated.” That’s especially true for boys, who make up about 70 percent of his caseload. And though he works with kids in every grade, he particularly likes working with the younger first- through third-graders. They’re more “rubbery” then, not yet hardened into a tough adolescent stance.

Current CCS Principal Michael Croft said Thorney has to be a “child whisperer” who is “completely trustworthy” for the program to work. Croft said the entire program is affordable in part because CCS is small and there are just two or three kids each year who need the type of support Thorney provides. Croft considers the money to be a long-term investment in the child and the community. Thorney’s work might spare somebody down the road having to ask, “What was going on in the first or second grade? How might things have been different for this boy or girl if we’d had the time to make sure their relationship skills were there?”

Thorney’s work often extends beyond the child to the family. He and his wife, Jill Gibbons, Cornwall’s social services director, also work with parents, helping them feel less “shame and blame.” That allows them to open up and improve their parenting skills. When parents get involved, Thorney said the long-term outcome for the family is better. Croft agreed Thorney’s work can have a positive ripple effect in the community. Croft said, “If the quality of someone’s experience is improved by our being able to be creative and find solutions, it can’t be measured.”

Cornwall Briefs

• Here We Go Again: The on-again, off-again plan to construct a cell tower off Bell Road (which is off Popple Swamp) is... on again. Verizon has a building permit from the Selectmen but the Noroton Area Health District still has to sign off on the project. The land in question is owned by Jack Gulliver.

• Going now from one tall story to another, we learned that the CVFD has placed something called a repeater transmitter atop Sharon Mountain to improve the company’s radio service.

• Historic Marker: There’s a beautiful new one—a directional sign—at the intersection of Town Street and Route 128, placed in the state right-of-way and built by master craftsman, artist, ice sculptor Zejke Hermann with funds contributed by Jerry Beers. It was Jerry’s grandma Josephine Wilson Sands who years ago paid for the original marker. And if you run into Zejke, ask him about the bee hives that inhabited the old marker when he came to take it away.

• There Are 169 towns in eight Connecticut counties and word comes from Secretary of State Denise Merrill that Cornwall—that’s us—had the highest voter turnout of all of them in the November election: 75 percent. Just another reason to swagger when you shop in the Sharon Market or the Kent Pharmacy.

• Janet Sanders has been elected chair of Cornwall’s Economic Development Committee, replacing the founding chair, Todd Piker, who remains on the committee. Mark Hampson is the new vice chair and Wendy Kennedy, the secretary.

• Appointments and Reappointments:
  - David Dolinsky to the Economic Development Committee; Earl Brecher to the NW Regional Mental Health Board; Fred Scoville III, ZBA alternate; Ginny Potter, Sydney Kaye Fund; Karen Bartomioi, Conservation Commission; Mark Hampson, NW Regional Tourism District; Phil Hart, Housatonic River Commission, and Susan Saccardi, Cornwall Grange Trust Fund. There remain openings on Park & Rec, Committee for Seniors, Inland Wetlands alternate, the Conservation Commission, ZBA alternate, the Cream Hill Lake Study Committee, and the Committee to Bring Duck Pin Bowling to Cornwall Bridge.

• December Clarification The Christmas tree funding (noted as sourced from the Selectmen and the Energy Task Force) of $1,000 actually came from state awards for public participation in energy programs, such as Home Energy Audits and CL&P’s Clean Energy Option. So: good going Cornwall!
